Push for term limits

If you are not frightened by the first five months of President Obama and Congress, something is wrong with one of us. Many of you complained about Bush's spending, but seem unconcerned about Obama's spending.

He has appointed 13 czars to oversee what should be left to the individual states. He said this was not a Christian country. He bowed to a foreigner. He says we can keep our guns while at the same time working on a bill to force the cost of ammunition beyond the reach of most. He continues to leave our southern border wide open. He intends to close Gitmo and bring terrorists into the USA. Gasoline prices are climbing while he apologizes to the world for America being the most advanced and generous country the world has ever known.

I am saddened to think the people growing up now will not have the freedoms my generation was unable to hold on to for them. Obama seems to think of himself as another Lincoln or Roosevelt. He and 95 percent of Congress have never had to work, meet a payroll or run a company. Yet they presume they are fit to take over banks, automobile and insurance companies. The same group of self-centered egotists who have ruined Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid is now just a few heartbeats from taking over health care.

General Motors is now Government Motors, at a cost to you and me that can never be repaid. They have to sell 10 million cars annually to break even, this with fewer dealers and fewer models. The bond holders who invested their money got the sour milk while the union received the cream and the taxpayers, who, by the way, number less than 50 percent of the population, are stuck with the bill.

I am not comfortable with this. Let's have a clean sweep of Congress. Push for term limits.
